hurry." The barber performed his office in the silence that marks the excellent workman, but whether direction spurred him is a matter of boubt. When he had finished, tipped his customer out of the chair and was tucking the towel about the neck of his next patron, he broke silence and inmired:

"Did you hear that man tell me to urry?"

"Yes. Why?" "Because I have known him about ten years, and he is always in a great burry in the barber shop. He drinks a good deal, but he is never in a hurry at the mloon. He will go from here straight to Toper's Tavern on Dearborn street, and he won't go out of there for an hour. He will not do any business, and he knows it before he goes. He will simply loat there till he can find no further excuse possible and then he will go to his office. He will spend three hours and as many dollars in the saloons every day, and he will grieve and fuss and hurry up everybody when it comes

"Men always have time to sit at their desks doing nothing, they are never in too much of a hurry at the club, they have time enough to stand for an hour any day on the street and look at women, they can lose time in bed and at breakfast, but when they come to the barber shop they are in frantic haste. Yet, if a hurrying barber happens to scratch them they get him discharged. A wellshaved man is respectable, no matter what clothes he has on.
